Resolved, That we should be doing justice neither to ourselves, or the company, did we fail to express our appreciation of the interest he has displayed for the success of this institution; our regret that circumstances render his retirement from the Presidency imperative; and our earnest hope, that he may long enjoy in his new home, the reward of his exertions for the diffusion of knowledge among those in whose midst he was born and raised. of the execution : At 12 o'clock the marine guard, who had een on duty since yesterday morning, were frawn up in double column in the yard near the scaffold, and at just twenty minutes after 12 the prisoner was brought out and taken on to the scaffold. He walked along with a composure of manner and step which would have prevented any one from recognizing in him the criminal who was so soon to meet his death. He ascended the steps of the calm pess until the drop fell. He was accompanied on the scaffold by Father O'Toole, Marshal Selden, Deputy Marshal Philips, ex-Mayor Walter Lenox, and by Messrs. King, Reilly, Robinson, and Wilson. After reaching the platform, a shore prayer was recited by the priest and the prisoner counted a prayer on his rosary. Marshal Selden then addressed him as follows: James Powers, it is my duty, as Marshal of this District, to execute the sentence which consigns you to the scaffold. It is painful to behold you in the morning of life standing where nothing but the ignomity of the gallows can stone for the murder you committed on a fellow man. The precepts of the Bible, the mandates of the law, and the safety of society, require that "whoseever sheddeth man's blood, by man shall his blood be shed." Reckless passions and atrocious misdeeds pervade the land, and dely the sanctity of justice. Immediately after the execution, the Marshal hurried from the scene, apparently, overcome by his emotions. The pectators generally were very much affected and several of them could not refrain from shedding tears. The most heart rending scene, however, was that of the parting of the criminal with his afflicted mother and sister. The cries of the latter awakened sympathy in the hardest-hearted of those present.

After the drop fell, the prisoner struggled very little, and died in a few moments, apparently without pain. He was allowed to hang the usual time, and his body was then placed in a coffin and delivered to his friends by the officers of the Jail. It will be taken to Baltimore for interment.
